

Wild Huntsman Podcast

I have been told that if you do what you always did, you are going to get what you always got. Maybe that could be tied into our membership with growing concern for dropping numbers. We have increased our outreach message with a website and a PayPal payment option. We continue to do the tried and true of advertisements in magazines and staffing booths at outdoor shows. But what else could we do?

I happened to get an email from a David LaMere requesting an interview about my books for the Wild Huntsman Podcast. For those who are not familiar with a podcast, it is a recorded session that can be listened to over the computer. Well, being leery that such requests could come from an anti-trapper and be used against trappers, I did some snooping over the internet and found he had a creditable background.

David was a law enforcement officer for the National Park Service with a background in different types of hunting, although squirrel seems to be his favorite. After a few emails back and forth, we set up a date. He interviewed me over the phone using a special recording device setup for his computer.

Although his original intent was to interview me about my books, I was able to work in several plugs for the NATCA. I will admit I made some errors about dates and history of the association, but I was able to get most corrected during the interview. If you want to listen to it, it is about 45 minutes long. At the beginning, he talks about his morning misfortune with getting his coffee. After that, he talks to me.

To listen to it, go to my website www.adirondackdick.com.

Scroll down and on the right side, press the triangle in a circle and it will start for you. You have to stay on the page to listen to it. If you click on anything in the website after it starts, the recording will stop.

Or you can go directly to his website

www.thewildhuntsman.com

and listen to it and other interviews he has done. Well I did something that I never did before, maybe I will get something other than what I have usually got.
